THE NEW LEG.

THE NEW LEG.

THE TINKER, THE TARTAN, AND THE TIMBER TON.

Alfred.—"The Cork Leg."

"I'll tell you a tale without any fan,
Of a terrible Turk, I heard old Sam, Who many a year had sold, 't was The greatest glory of great Islam."

With a solemn look, &c.

He'd a fair cousin, this terrible Turk,
But he loved his own and he hated work,
And his only care was all care to shirk,
To lolly his slaves and the soldiers burke.

With a solemn look, &c.

Prove who might, he'd not yield a pug;
He kicked the devil as you'd suck an egg,
And if for pity they came to beg,
He kicked them with his terrible leg.

With a solemn look, &c.

Not in a day of fighting he had his fill,
And in a terrible Turk he did kill, No gobble but leg crushed, until This terrible Turk lay upon and still.

With a solemn look, &c.

His fine rejoiced, and his slaves noddle graced
Of the terrible Turk, sudden fallen head,
For they thought the mishap might his temper tame, (As, at least,) that he couldn't kick quite the same.

With a solemn look, &c.

But it was by blood, if not by persuasion,
An art in words and education,
Came in, and checked their jubilation
By denouncing the Turk's leg-terribleness.

With a solemn look, &c.

Says he, "Don't get in a rage, I beg,
Only trust to my paternal Balkan leg,
Ask along on that artificial peg,
You shall stand like an Eastern Siles Wegg."

With a solemn look, &c.

The Turk didn't see his way out of it quite,
So Artful and doctors would not fight;
And the wooden leg was put on sight,
Just fitted it on and covered it tight.

With a solemn look, &c.

Both Tinker and Turk thought the leg a bore,
And the Turk's nag thought the doctor bore; "Fotherby haughty," "It's oldrogue's limbs they restore!" He'll soon be kicking as usual as before."

With a solemn look, &c.

Unhappily a rival artist, one W. G.,
With much restoration did not agree,
"Much better have left the job to me, I'd have cut of the other leg, too, d'ye see?"

With a solemn look, &c.

But the artificial artist, contented stood,
And regarded his work in triumphant mood.
"At odds I'll make the new leg of wood Against the old one of flesh and blood."

With a solemn look, &c.

Says W. G., "The fine to talk,
No doubt you fancy you've scored a shalk,
The fess of the Turk 'tis yours aim to haik,
But wait till the old rogue limps to walk."

With a solemn look, &c.

If the Turk with this new arrangement agree,
And manage to move, even W. G., Wishing well to the Moslem as to his,
His "Reenyan" may find it in it F. G.

With a solemn look, &c.

THE TOWN ORDER IN SHETLAND.

The only other official of any importance
I ever heard of in Lerwick is the town crier, and he is the principal person in the town, man, but I have no doubt the same practice is in vogue here that prevails in Orkney.

There for the moderate sum of sixpence, the bell and clangor through the town with a brass bell, and delivers his notice, and he is very rare in rapidity, that only by following him about and taking up the tale at the point it was just lost, can you in any way gather whether he wishes to announce that a particular house is in flames, or that Mrs. Macbride has been suddenly delivered of the long expected twins.
And he is so quick in his delivery, that he is a shilling, then the crier comes out with a big drum, the largest drum I ever saw, which made the greatest uproar I ever heard, equal to the drums of a hundred circeuses rolled into one. With this he halts at every turn and fires away at the drum as if he had a special spite against the instrument—as very probably he has; and all the people rush out to witness the noise, but they were more open to hear the important news. The drum also presses so heavily upon the crier that his speed of utterance is brought down to something like moderation, and you may gather the information without joining the mob that never fails to attend a big drum in its progress.—Argosy.

ARTISTIC COOKERY IN CENTRAL AFRICA.

In the abodes of primitive knowledge as to how long we might be bellowing in the cafes, we were all compelled to be extremely economical. Goat and pig meat were such luxuries that we declined to think of them as being possible with our means; tea, coffee, sugar, sardines, were fast feeding into the memory land past pleasures, and chickens and canned meats were the only things more in our country. We possessed one rain from far Uroga, and Mirambo, the black riding ass—the other two asses had died a few weeks before—but we should have deserved the name of cannibals had we dared to think of sacrificing the pets of the camp. Therefore —by the will of the gods—contentment had to be found in "cold baked stuff," or cold cassava, bread ground out, or maize, yams, and porridge. Ground maize they threw into the sieves, and, when sufficiently baked, ate them like hungry men. For use such food was too crude; besides, my stomach, called to sustain a brain and body strained to the utmost by responsibilities, required that some civilized should be shown to it. Necessity reduced my localities, and a faded stomach goaded my inventive powers to a high pitch. I called my faithful cook, told him to clean and wash mortar and pestle for the preparation of a "high art" dish.
Frank approached also to receive instructions, so that, in my absence, he might remin. Remarking the cook of each the Monday after Pentecost, old style, is the great Russian feast. In times earlier the young man water-renewed, but never dried. The old Russian habit of wearing primitive it was distinguished by an extraordinary custom. Upon this day, towards afternoon, a father was used to parade his marriageable daughters in some public place, that all young men might make his choice. Old Russian habits still retained their vigour in the capital, and the young men, dressed in their smart frocks, when the time and position of the family would allow. The Monday after Pentecost was a privileged day, looked forward to by youths and maidens with joy, not unmingled with anxiety. The merchant or shopkeeper donned his superb coat of cloth, short-waisted, long-tailed, and with a collar of ermine or fur, and his knee boots a polish, brushed his beaver hair, and went forth to the maiden show. Not until very recent years has it occurred to him that the liver of his craft is a thing to be ashamed of; that it is hideously ugly he has not yet perceived. With his wife upon his arm, and his daughters two or three behind him, he might be seen in the drawing saloon. After a few turns up and down to recognise their friends, the family took seats, and waited for their luck, whilst the young men strolled along modestly criticised in silence and making choice. It must have been a very quiet and pretty sight, in the days before men and girls were so much given to the "talk and the loud" and the "speak of, of course, for that object, was a third class of persons for that object. Having found the girl after his heart's desire, the young man put himself in communication with the marriage agent, a functionary who still holds an important place in Russia. She carries out proposals, and settles the dowry, and the young man settled the dowry, and all went well brought the young folk together, receiving a commission from each family. The complacencies of the agent did not cease here. A wedding was, and is, accounted mean unless a General attend it in full uniform. Generals abound in Russia, and the marriage agent has a list of them, and the young man, Moscow included, not to speak of the capital, warriors are to be found with small means of livelihood. The marriage agent keeps a list of them, at different tariffs, whom she supplies for a minimum of 25 roubles, say £3 los., their food and drink. Others she has, more distinguished, for 50 roubles, say £7 10s., and so on in charge. A further tariff regulates the crosses, medals, and decorations they shall carry, which are payable in due proportion to their rarity. This fine old system is breaking down, however, like the show of girls at Pentecost Monday. The Emperor discomfited it, and they say that the best of the system is to be got rid of, and the Emperor appears. St. Petersburg the sole remains of a custom never well-established is a promenade in the Jardin d'été. This is a handsome grove, decked but not adorned with statues. Its marshy soil does not favour grass, but dandelions and rank weeds make a carpet which Ruffians would not have scorned to tread upon. The Emperor has been told about, that the sunshine scarcely strikes those narrow alleys, flitting through the golden drops. One side of the middle line is filled with restaurants and pretty cafés, always full. A band plays in the open. The scenery, however, is complete, but the persons lack. One must go further afield for that, and to the "garden" of the "garden" of the "garden", or, indeed, under a palat. The marriage agent has not their beauty. No youth to tempt at the show to day, unless the marriage brokers charmed him with that golden philid which the true love-seeress. A great crowd it was, full of girls decked out in their best and but desperately prosaic. But young ladies, as well as acknowledged beauties, and they had a pleasant day of it in the garden. They cracked nuts, they strolled in groups, they laughed and talked together whilst a band played, and the gentlemen looked on. The alleys of the garden, the streets leading thence, and the Norway itself were strewn with flowers. The marriage agent, St. Petersburg, whilst diplomats wrangled in Berlin. In the evening the streets were filled of moujiks, good-humouredly incapable, playfully uncertain as to their gait, and thoroughly happy.

Whatever pessimist croakers may say to the contrary, the age we live in is a

Whatever conspiracy croakers may say to the contrary, the age will live in an age of social reform. Allowing for much that is frivolous and fickle, there are many wholehearted supporters of which will be the common sense in matters of dress, costume and general opinion. New notions are eagerly accepted for their novelty, and despite the collapse of many foolish and senseless introductions, the chances are in favour of the fittest. Observation inclines me to hazard the statement that, in consequence of the changes which have taken place at yesterday, it talks of with respect to tomorrow will adopt to-morrow. Theology, ecclesiasticism, music and painting, dress and etiquette, have passed through their transition stages, and now the engrossing question of the immediate future promises to be the Food Question. The cases have already been brought to the apostrophe of the 'Coöperative Supply Movement' which alluded to the latent discontent with the method of distribution of foods, and the rebellion against the blood-and-iron rule of butchermonger and the deep-determination to inaugurate a radical reform of the domestic budget. The cost of the food is being shifted with increasing substitutes for the most boastful of Old England. That spirit—unmistakable to that which martyrs were made of—still animates paternalism and his paternalist bent; and although the obstacle in the way of the desired reform and the change of the reign, the change of the pattern is unlikely to reach before victory is at hand. Unpopular as all proposals to tamper with the orthodox men have been, we have lived to see the despised teetotalism of our boyhood assume the garb of gentility (Whether from motives of noble or ignoble ambition, from the desire to influence the masses, or from the desire to escape the odious protest against the contagion of fashion or as a protest against the mania for fantastic drinks, or more probably from a combination of these reasons—we see princesses and peers, bishops, parsons, doctors, and eminent laymen, parading their conversion to pledged abstinence, and professing to regard as a disgraceful confession of weakness and weakness. Accepting the apotheosis of teetotalism as the most favourable light, it still remains to be asked whether it is not possible that mischief, not less serious if less demonstrative, result from over-eating or mis-eating than from intonation. The Germans say that the danger to health lies with their tea and coffee and sugar, and there is no doubt that the proverb than meets the eye. Alcohol is a stimulant among others, as mate, game, tea, and coffee; but there are probably more persons of both sexes who abuse their organs and the digestion through liquor excess in taking the latter than in taking the former. The latter dangers are hurt by the former still less. Habits of eating and drinking, and at such time, tells in the long-run as surely as occasional intemperance, as witness the chronic dyspepsia and the horde of minor ailments which beset this generation of the well-to-do. These and other faults seem to be biting the hand that feeds them. It is to be hoped that the time approaches when it will be wise to turn the scale over a new leaf, and reverse in our eating and drinking to greater simplicity.

Among those who submit practical proposals for the reform of the allowed and
